Newspaper of the ANU Students Association

On Friday morning, July 26, the Board of the School of General Studies will consider the implementation of the student demands on education.

Assert YOUR right:

1. To education not indoctrination
2. To participate in an effective way in the control of your education
3. To reject participation which is purely gratis - where your voice can be heard, but the decision to listen lies with others. An effective voice is achieved only with the achievement of equal power
4. To choose forms of assessment which are consistent with the course you are doing - not which are imposed uniformly on all courses - and which are part of your education, not contradictory to it.
5. To have courses which fit your desires, interests and needs.
6. To have classes which are small enough for effective participation and communication.
7. To make decisions which affect your life, not to always have them made for you.
8. To have courses which do not serve to produce ideas and programmes which stagnate and maintain a crumbling system, but which have some relationship to meaningful social change - e.g. Women's Studies.

The Board will not make a decision to implement the demands in the way outlined in the 10/10 Committee report, but will delay (perhaps for all time) such a decision unless students act to implement the demands.

A meeting will be held at the UNION at 1pm, on THURSDAY JULY 25, which it is hoped will initiate effective action to support the demands, prevent delay and achieve implementation.

AN OCCUPATION OF THE CHANCELRY, THE SEAT OF POWER AND THE SYMBOL OF OUR ALIENATION, SEEMS A LOGICAL CHOICE.

JOIN THE OCCUPATION

On 26 April the Board of the School of General Studies adopted as 'desirable objectives' with minor amendments student proposals for

1. Staff-student control on an equal basis of representation in the determining of course content
2. Student choice of the means of assessment
3. An end to overcrowded classes by the repetition of lectures or tutorials, not be the introduction of quotas
4. Establishment of a Women's Studies course, the content of which to be decided on by the women of the university.

Since first term students, by a process of negotiation, have achieved numerous changes which are consistent with the four proposals. However, in some cases the changes have not been satisfactory. Students asking for an alternative to a formal three hour examination have been offered a 10,000 word assignment. In this situation there is little students can now do. However, under the proposed mechanism it would be possible for a departmental committee with equal staff/student voting rights to decide whether these are reasonable alternatives.

In those units where the rights of students to effectively participate in decisions of course content and assessment are denied these proposals are a realistic way in which their voice can be effectively heard.

It is in the interests of all students to see these proposals implemented without delay. The threats to immediate implementation are obvious.

(a) The Board could itself reject the 10/10 committee report or could amend it in such a way as to cause the proposals to be meaningless. There is already one proposed amendment which would make the proposal for equal staff/student voting on decisions of course content meaningless by making a 2/3 majority necessary for changes to take place. We are currently the initiators of change and such a proposal would mean that student initiatives could be readily crushed.

(b) Much simpler and more likely is that although the Board is committed "to discuss the implementation of the four proposals...at its July 1974 meeting" it will postpone any decision at that meeting and refer the question to the Faculties for discussion. Since the Faculties in essence are staff bodies, their very existence and their power being indirect contradiction to the proposals, the referral of these proposals to them is allowing staff to be judge and jury in their own case. It is already on notice that at least one Faculty does not accept the desirable objectives let alone concrete proposals for implementation. Referral to Faculty will almost certainly produce a contradictory mass of resolutions ranging from particular amendments to complete rejection of the principles. It will give the Board a marvellous opportunity to later reject the proposals outright. A SIMPLE REFERRAL TO FACULTIES WOULD BE TO TAKE US BACKWARDS FROM THE POSITION WE ACHIEVED IN FIRST TERM.

The Board must on Friday July 26 either consider the implementation of the proposals then and there or (as the student Association said) at the minimum:

"Agree that in the light of the report of the 10/10 Committee the proposals the Board accepted as desirable objectives should be implemented fully from the beginning of 1975 and that any delay or referral to Faculties should as far as the Board is concerned only deal with questions of the details of implementation in the 10/10 Committee report."

Attend the Education Meeting 1pm Thursday (Union) and support an occupation to ensure that the Board adopts the procedure.

Nothing Unsayable Said Right. Garrie Hutchinson. Sun Books.

In assembling his Collected Shorter Poems, W.H. Auden wrote that he excluded those of his poems that he had come to consider 'dishonest', 'bad mannered' or 'boring', three determinants that I find useful when sorting the murky humbug of much modern poetry.

Naturally I am only competent to suspect rather than detect dishonesty in Garrie Hutchinson's book, Nothing Unsayable Said Right. Perhaps it is the unhelpful blurbage on the dust-jacket that describes the poems as an attempt 'to place a particular set of experiences within a personal set of rhythms and words', that arouses my suspicion; or perhaps the posturing biographical notes (I...his political and social education advanced steadily leftwards. After atoken attempt to enter the University's realms of respectability...he now claims to have resigned from the counter culture... and 'sits at home and types'?). Then again, perhaps it is the concrete poems of the SEX section of the book, whose shallow gimmickry brings to mind the most incompetent of advertising, or the very murkiness of many of the poems, for example, a poem called 'historical ball-games' from the sequence 'Memoirs of a Pool-Haunting Man.'

to the damp fuse in the potato patch.

The question of course is, would the lines be redeemed by footnotes. Certainly lucidity is out of fashion in poetry at present, but I nevertheless find it a useful guarantee of intentions. But then I also acknowledge that Mr Hutchinson is finally the only one competent to judge the honesty of his own intentions.

Bad or good manners may be as obsolete as lucidity in poetry, but like the latter it can be a safeguard, in this case against either the mawkish self indulgence of a poem like 'sources':

business they said, and they meant it.
what do you guys want? my sky?

I haven't got one.

or the brash and simplistic polemics of 'aesthetics and the scientific method for the ordinary pool-player':

wisely.

The more disturbing of the faults I found belonged to Auden's third category, the tediousness of the book, disturbing because the poems bored me despite many of the fashionable canons of 'competence' being demonstrated in them. There is the slavishness to concision, a voice that modulates into frequent parched humour, though never wit, the fragmentation of sense and the abundance of obscure references. Some of the poems I found more pleasing, for example the first in the 'Memoirs of a Pool-Haunting Man', where despite the formal shapelessness of the poem there is a deft and perceptive treatment of a particular kind of male/male relationship. But such relief from murk and gimmickry I found rare.

Why spend so long declaiming such a book? I do so because it represents a direction in Australian Poetry that is endorsed by many of the poetry establishment, and if as Thomas Shapcott predicts in his review of Nothing Unsayable Said Right, that Garrie Hutchinson will be one of the important poetic voices of the future, then on the strength of this book, that is a grim prophesy indeed.

A Dictionary of Australian Education. John MacLaren. Penguin.

It is unfortunate that education as both an industry and a technology is entrenching itself more rather than less deeply into our thinking. We regard it primarily as a necessary preparation for life rather than the inevitable process of life. A Dictionary of Australian Education makes no mention of the term 'deschooling' nor of the names of the three important educationalists who have visited Australia in recent years, Illich, Jackson, and Freire. Perhaps justifiably the compiler, John MacLaren, would claim that these were outside the scope of his book, and in many other respects the dictionary is thoroughly up to date, with entries under the Karmel Report and the recently established ACT Schools Authority. Thus, though ignoring some of the important ideas in the modern world of education, the dictionary is a useful prospectus to an industry and technology for the industrialists, the technologists and the more inquisitive consumers.

Since first term the staff/student committee set up to recommend a concrete plan for implementation has met ten times and after compromise by both sides agreed to a program for immediate implementation. This plan for implementation is the absolute minimum students should accept. Even as it stands the plan does not fully meet the original proposals. The Students' Association substantially agreed to the recommendations. The substance of the committee recommendations are:

1. Staff-student participation on an equal basis of representation in determining course content.

(a) Unit level: The committee recommends certain guarantees that students should be consulted and properly informed at the beginning of a course. If staff and students cannot reach agreement about course content then the matter is referred for a decision to a staff-student committee on which staff and students have equal voting rights. Such referral cannot occur after a certain time without staff and student agreement.

(b) Department level: The University plans to give powers to the Departments by setting up Departmental Committees to recommend to the Head of Department or direct to Faculty on course content, assessment and other matters. Students and many staff felt this was a logical place for ensuring staff students participation on an equal basis in determining course content. However, staff feared equal voting rights on this committee for all matters, and instead proposed that where a student or staff representative on the departmental committee or a 1/5 of a unit required it the departmental committee should become a body where staff and students have equal voting rights. This will cover student suggestions for course changes in future years, new courses and changes, usually of emphasis, at the beginning of a course.

(c) Faculty level: Most decisions on course content and assessment are formally made at the Faculty although the Faculty rarely goes against the decision of a department and where the Faculty does disagree it refers it back for reconsideration. However, student feared that with an equal staff-student decision at the departmental level Faculty, which is overwhelmingly dominated by staff voting strength, might change its practice. Students pressed for the Faculty Education Committee where staff and students are equal to take the powers of the Faculty in these matters but lost this on the committee. However, all such matters are to be referred to FEC's, and their recommendations will be 'noted' by Faculty.

2. Student choice of the means of assessment.

It was agreed that the same process for decision making as for course content be adopted (i.e. discussion within each unit and the referral of disputes to an equal staff/student committee). In addition, there will be individual choice within a range which is consistent with course objectives. Unless 90% of the students in a unit and the member of staff agrees, no form of assessment will be compulsory until it is approved by the Department Committee on which staff and students have equal voting strength. The committee recommends that a reduction of the number of grading levels be considered.

3. An end to overcrowded classes by the repetition of lectures and tutorials not by the introduction of quotas. The committee recommends that some action should be taken against Departments which do not give first year units their correct entitlement of staff. (i.e. milking 1st year staff entitlements to give preferential treatment to later year units). Further, if students feel that their class is overcrowded, then this can be considered by an equal staff-student committee.

4. Establishment of a women's studies course to be decided by the women of the university.

The Committee commended the proposal course outline (drawn up by the Women's Studies Committee) of the women's studies course for the consideration of the Faculty of Arts. Any system in which learning and teaching are divorced is no more than indoctrination. Without this demand the current situation where students construct ideas, essays and exams, the frame of reference and results of which are determined for them, can never be overturned. Staff often see their role as providing the goods for disciplined consumption and reproduction by a vast army of students. The difference between students and factory workers is this sense lies in their more flexible hours and their task of reproducing the ideology and management of our society. In this sense it is imperative that students have more say in what their labour here will produce. As the essential component of the university students can no longer accept a say in this matter which is occasionally and benevolently bestowed upon them. Their participation must be effective and this means at the minimum equal power.

Participation is in itself education. The division of functions so that one person determines the problem and the rest act upon it is not only antithetical to a reasonable society and politically obnoxious but, because of its inefficiency and falsity, is also anti-educational. The determination of the problem is in itself a determination of the solution. Also by this division certain areas of knowledge are suppressed from courses, even if not consciously. It is essential, therefore, that students have a role in changing courses and in the determination of new ones.

This proposal may often in practice simply mean students can choose the emphasis in units in a way that more accurately reflects their needs and knowledge. However, the argument that their role should be limited since they are ill equipped to decide what they will study is a circular one.

Such an approach reinforces the alienation in our society, where individuals are prevented from taking action through a constant reinforcement of their own inadequacies. Knowledge and action are not divorced and it is only by the experience of participation that students will become better equipped to exercise it. Students in the current situation have been socialised to accept their passive role and they are, therefore, all too willing to listen to and accept staff judgments in these matters.

The 10/10 committee recommended that, within certain limits, the student should be able to structure his assessment program to his own individual needs and abilities. Specifically, it will be difficult for any one form of assessment to be made compulsory unless this is approved by a department committee where staff and students have equal voting rights.

This means that, hopefully, students will not simply be presented with either a staff decided range of assessment procedures, all of which are compulsory (which is the most common current procedure), nor will they be presented with a staff determined range of procedures, and forced to choose between them.

The arguments that will most frequently be directed against these proposals are:

(1) Staff must determine assessment in conformity with professional requirements.

(2) That individual choice of assessment, will deny an equitable base for comparison between students.

(3) That students will take the barest option. (1) the degrees of B.A., B.Sc., B.Ec., B.A.[A.S.] B.Arts/Law are no longer specific qualifications for specific jobs, either in the public service nor, in most cases, in industry. Yet despite this observable trend, students are forced more and more to see their courses in terms of the assessment required of them, and the results they get: creating a one-directional input-output process rather than a participatory learning process. In many cases, this denies the overall competence and decision making ability that will be required in later employment.

For students to have an individual choice of assessment, is not to prevent staff and students from considering professional and other requirements when choosing their assessment, and the course emphasis that this invariably involves. Within this framework, students are capable of tailoring their courses to the varying individual and social needs which so clearly exist. To claim that courses, assessment, social and student requirements are, and must be, uniform, is to deny social reality.

Bangla Desh

Bangladesh. Two and a half years ago ANU students were among the fastest outside Parliament House, demanding that the McMahon government increase its emergency aid to the new nation of Bangladesh from half a million dollars to at least ten million. It is said by some politicians that public disenchantment over the McMahon Government's unresponsiveness to these demands helped lose it the 1972 election.

Bangladesh has almost disappeared from public consciousness since then. Little appears about it in the press. What does is often not flattering:

Aid-giving is never unambiguous, and it is not always the donor's fault, as James Sterba argued in the New York Times of October 8, 1972. Many diplomats and foreign relief workers, he claims were finding Bangladesh's appeals for help a bit hollow "even though they readily agree that Bangladesh has more problems and needs than any other nation in the world". The main reason they say is that many of the country's national and local leaders have shown more willingness to help themselves than to help their nation or their people. Millions of dollars of food and relief supplies, Sterba alleges, could not be accounted for "Bangladesh appears to be adrift in labyrinthine confusion". Disorganisation was again stressed by Lewis Simons, in an article in The Australian on June 21, 1973, titled From Liberation to Chaos.

Each time a visitor returns to Bangladesh he finds life has become a bit more unbearable. Each time more people are hungry, prices are higher. Clothing is now literally rotting off people's backs. He describes daily demonstrations in Dacca against hunger, high costs and corruption, and growing cynicism.

"Planning for food imports, spare parts purchases, industrial needs — is largely neglected. Instead the Government bumps along from crisis to crisis, crying out in panic whenever a new shortage or failure is discovered."

Apart from stories of floods, and recent diplomatic negotiations with Pakistan, more recent newspapers reports continue the theme of disorganisation — the problems of the jute industry, and the blackmarket export of rice to India which will mean that despite bumper crops, Bangladesh will again have to import wheat in 1974. But none of this is particularly surprising, given the problems that face Bangladesh.

"The country would probably be impossible to govern and administer by the best men even in normal times," admitted James Sterba in the New York Times report. "Its land is overburdened by population. In normal times, people are hungry and malnourished. Natural disasters are commonplace, and argument and confusion are almost Bengali art forms."

One third of Bangladesh, on average, gets flooded every three years — about every eight years two thirds of it is flooded. Its population density — 75 million people in an area of 55,000 square miles — is the same as that of Canberra. Average per capita income is the same as twenty years ago — only $30 to $70 pa

Eighty per cent of the people are directly dependent on agriculture. They live in 65,000 small villages averaging 1,000 inhabitants with 6 million small farms of two and a half acres or less in size.

In early 1972, even the meagre assets — huts, bullocks, ploughs and tools — of its villagers had been destroyed by civil war. So much for statistics.

It is all too easy to be discouraged by stories of corruption and inefficiency, and assume that nothing can be done.

Indeed, on the score of population control, it is hard to see what can be done. The current rate of increase is 3.3% per annum — a net increase of about 6,000 per day or 2½ million per year. Yet given Moslem attitudes towards the family, the picture seems unlikely to change much. A man is blessed in the number of his sons. Their security for their old age is their children; as half their children are likely to die before they reach adulthood, a man must have twice the number of children necessary to support him in his old age.

Flooding, although at first sight inevitable, gives that most of Bangladesh is on a natural floodplain, offers some possibilities for control, though this may need to be undertaken at an international level.

Floods are not purely an act of God — deforestation in the Nepalese Himalayas, according to a recent issue of CERES, contributes significantly to their extent. Forestry is an area in which Australia has proven aid expertise.

World forestry aid to Nepal help decrease floods in India, Pakistan and Bangladesh. The main cause of flooding, according to Leo Kelly, in the July 1973 issue of Hungerscope (produced by Freedom from Hunger) is the silting of the Ganges and Jumna rivers, which causes these rivers to overflow at the time of the monsoon.

"If the rivers were scoured", he claims, "and the silt used to fill up great holes along the banks, the flooding could be contained and a large amount of extra farming land could be provided. An even more dramatic solution to the flooding would be for the rivers to be controlled back inside India and Assam."

This could provide Bangladesh with masses of hydroelectric power and water for controlled irrigation and multiple cropping during the dry season.

Only an agency of the size of the world bank, he claims, could undertake such a project.

Food is one of the most obvious and basic problems facing Bangladesh. Because of outdated agricultural techniques Bangladesh has never been able to produce all its grain requirements. This means that her precious foreign exchange, which could have been used to purchase agricultural inputs — better seeds, pesticides, fertilisers and tools — is used up in buying extra grain.

It is here that Australia's estimated $9 million worth of food aid in 1973-74 is meeting a real need.

Yet food aid is not a satisfactory long-term form of aid. It would be preferable in the long-term to assist Bangladesh to increase her own food yields, perhaps by helping her set up her own fertiliser plants. While Australia gave $1 million worth of project aid in 1973-74 little if any was for agricultural improvement. Hopefully this gap in past programmes will be remedied by the new overseas aid agency now being set up.

Protein, in particular, is in short supply. The Government's food programme only provides cereals — pulses, wheat and rice. There are little or no beef, cattle, pigs, or since the war, poultry and fishing fails to make up the deficit. In a small way World University Service is doing something here — part of the money we raise in 1973 and 1974 is committed to a poultry improvement project at the University of Myensingh.

The ordinary citizen is lucky if he can average a pound of rice per day plus perhaps a little milk, a piece of fruit and some sweet tea.

Developing a large scale livestock industry is out in the short term because the grain is needed to feed people. Before any progress can be made in increasing the protein supply then, agricultural production needs to be increased. The key to this, according to Leo Kelly, is the sort of anti-illiteracy campaign being sponsored by ANU Development Action. "If the farmer can read and write and add up correctly he can also absorb new ideas on improved hygiene, nutrition and family planning."

Other programmes such as the provision of deep level irrigation wells equipped with electric pumps, the introduction of high-yielding grains the fortification of grains with essential amino acids, and the introduction of double and triple cropping of rice, green and yellow vegetables and oilseeds will have to be undertaken by other agencies such as the FAO. This is another area in which Australia might be especially qualified to offer assistance.

Aid is no panacea, and especially in a situation as complex as Bangladesh. Yet, in a more limited way, it can have a useful impact. Bangladesh at the moment, is asking for all the help it can get.

SUPPORT ZANU

The Europeans in Rhodesia have treated Africans as slaves, as beasts of burden and as nuisance children. They have deliberately stifled all African say in their own affairs, stripped them of their lands, freedom and self-respect. What the European says in the law courts, in business, in Parliament and in the African tribal trust areas is absolute. On the other hand the Africans were never the peaceful robots the Europeans want them to be. They resist valiantly and often successfully, and by the creation of paranoia in the European the slave in some senses are the masters; the conquered the conquerors. The Europeans are like the flies stuck in the fly paper; they have won the battles but lost the war.

The seeming contradiction between European iron rule and African determinism stems partly from the fact that this action or determination occurs within a restricted frame of reference. The frame of reference of European and African differ radically. It is the same sort of difference as that which leads the Rhodesian government and many Australians to call the freedom fighters in Rhodesia terrorists. Similarly, many regard the distribution of pamphlets as a democratic right while the Rhodesian government calls the same act terrorism, punishable by lengthy imprisonment.

Those Africans asserting independence for Zimbabwe by force are freedom fighters and terrorists at the same time. They represent terror to those who for three quarters of a century have meted out murder, rape, robbery and terror to the Africans and they are freedom fighters to those so terrorized. That is not to say that these two views are equally valid.

The vision as terrorists is so easily turned on its head while the vision as freedom fighters is based upon the indisputable fact that the Europeans stole the country by force. It is difficult to disguise a war.

The different frames of reference that lead us, from a sympathetic standpoint to see European iron rule and African determinism are similarly unequal. This is seen by the different ways African resistance is approached in these two visions. The approach which leads us to see European iron rule sees colonization as a process of dispossession. The approach which leads us to see African determinism sees colonization as a process of conquest and struggle.

The Africans are dispossessed; the Europeans make the laws, the officials and the other institutions in their own model. They take the power to determine the model away from the Africans in asserting their rule. From the point of view of what I have called dispossession, colonization is therefore an institutional process, even if one does not ignore their effects on minds, values and ways of life. Within this frame of reference we can see European iron rule and barbarism, but never African determinism.

Colonialism is also conquest and struggle; the European steals the Africans' lands and liberty by force. From the point of view of conquest the Africans' power is not removed. The model is simply not determined for them, as it is from the viewpoint of dispossession. Within the context of this conquest view it is possible to argue for an African-determined history while still seeing the barbarism of colonialism. For the European, fear of the African and his rebellious action deprives the European of freedom of action even within his own model.

Colonial governments send out administrators, set up parliaments and make repressive laws. In this sense they impose a social order upon the Africans. If we see these institutions, however, as the central concern we can only see iron rule; for in a structural sense the Africans cannot really determine anything.

The dispossession view, which sees rule through the control of the institutional framework is a widespread method of belittling the role of mass movements in history. This approach generally limits a study to the development over time of, first a nation, second its institutions which have concrete manifestations (eg parliaments and law courts), third its greatness and fourth its less concrete institutions (eg families).

The dispossession approach has thus seen the history of Rhodesia in the following terms. In the 1890's Rhodes and his men moved into that area of Africa inhabited by the Shona and Ndebele tribes.

After some struggle, probably due to inter-tribal animosity on control of the land and they, through the British South Africa Company, were granted a charter to rule the area appropriately named Rhodesia. Following the making of Rhodesia into a substantially self-governing colony in 1923 the Rhodesian government gave, by legislation, 51% of the land to the whites and 49% to the blacks. Although the white parliament exercised ultimate control to rule and steal black areas, a substantial amount of administration was handed to government-paid chiefs.

The basic features of Rhodesian history from this point of view are how the Europeans created a nation where there was not one before; what laws they made, what great men inspired it and those Africans, like the chiefs, whom they dragged into their system. African determined history is clearly not possible within this framework since the framework is colonialism - it is European. We can look at this framework from an African point of view and see barbarity and injustice, but it remains a European framework and gives no clues as to real solutions.

Only during the period 1923-1956 can the process of dispossession, the imposition of the European institutional framework, be said to be in any way central. During this period African resistance was less than in other periods and what resistance there was, was itself based on the dispossession model. It was resistance to the imposition of the European framework rather than resistance to the conquest (resistance to the European).

This period 1923 to 1956 effectively divides Rhodesian colonial history into three: 1923-1923, the period of conquest; 1923-1956, the period of dispossession; 1956-present, the period of resistance. By making the struggle central we change the picture painted in the West

U.D.I. becomes a much less significant event.

The period of conquest is the war between European and African over power over the land. The Africans in most ways lost this war. 1923-1956 is the period of dispossession; here the battleground is defined by the Europeans, and the Africans must inevitably lose. The period of resistance in the period in which we can argue for an African-determined history. We need not wait for victory.

Rhodesia was made by the British in the 1890's. The African name, Zimbabwe, is the name of old ruins which the white settlers would not believe were made by Africans. The pioneer tradition is a tradition of conquest. On the one hand, these events are painted as glorious and heroic victories for the white settlers, justice and from the world, a cliché removed from its meaning.

In this way, people came to assume that the chiefs of today in Rhodesia were chiefs in the sense of the word Europeans know it, that is binding rulers and spokesmen. In fact the chiefs were very limited in their power from the 1890's onwards and as they said to the Pearce Commission in 1972, they were employed by the government to act as paid public servants carrying out government instructions, but that they could never speak for or decide for their people on important matters.

did not have to know how to tell the time to experience this imposition, they only had to be employed or bound into slave labour to understand it. From the point of view of conquest the African who strikes or who refuses to recognize European timetables commits an act which is much more significant than an institutional view would admit.

Any propaganda story of Rhodesia will tell you that the rebellion of 1896 was instigated by those warlike Ndebele because the whites were preventing them from barbarically raiding the Shona tribes-nomadic and therefore needed much land. But the most important factor is the identity with the land and cattle - the self-respect which the whites denied the Africans; Ten percent of the white population was lost, and the blacks would certainly have won had British and South African troops not come to the settlers' aid. Rhodes' peace talks were much less courageous a gesture than alleged, and his promises with regard to the land were not kept. The whites in retaliation massacred thousands.

The defeat in 1897 set African organisation and resistance back particularly among the Shona, where the chiefs were killed or discredited. However, amongst the Ndebele there was resistance to moving the reserves, and by 1919, the eductor to ZAPU) was anti-industry since the industrialisation of Rhodesia was used as an argument against majority rule.

During the seven weeks from August 1964, there were 63 road-blocks, 591 stonings, 20 petrol bombs seized, 205 cases of arson, 243 cases of what the Rhodesians call 'intimidation' (which is more likely than not the handing out of a leaflet), 56 cases of possession of explosives, 90 cases of damage to property, and about 350 cases of assault. Police with dogs had to be called to the University campus to disperse students who were blockading the new all-white Council: some 70% of all non-white students took part and some were expelled for 'shouting abusive words'. That the movement was still grass-root in some cases can be seen in the struggle of the Tomgweya people, who are refusing to move under the land tenure act, so that Europeans can take over their land and the Government irrigate and electrify it. The huts and crops of the Tomgweya people were destroyed and some who were caught were detained.

At least since 1960 the Africans have determined Rhodesian history in that fear of African action and threatened action has ruled the lives of the whites and the actions of their Government. The privileged position of whites in Rhodesia contrasts very favourably with the position in which many of the people would have been in had they remained in Britain. Writing in the Rhodesian Citizen the paper's chief reporter addresses himself in an open letter to Harold Wilson, then Prime Minister, to whom he says:

Our class had a pretty raw deal in England not so long ago...

For a long time the artisans, lower grade clerks and poorer farmers have formed a second class in Rhodesian society, the first being the Establishment (with a capital E) made up of top bureaucrats, rich business-men, successful farmers and professional men. The lower class saw itself as a distinct group in society, in opposition to the ruling class which had controlled the country since 1923. The traditionally paternalistic attitude of the Establishment in Rhodesia was not shared by white workers who had no time at all for wishy-washy philanthropists who they believed were more concerned to promote the advancement of Africans than to secure the position of white workers in the Rhodesian economy.

Why, however, did the right wing, more working class, Rhodesia Front group, triumph over the Establishment? It was due to African pressure that Native Affairs became a party political issue, and

Before the late 1950's 'in some respects the colour bar was more harshly applied than in South Africa'. That great liberal, Todd, who was Prime Minister from September 1953 to January 1958 suppressed with four battalions of soldiers, a peaceful strike at the Wankie coal mines in 1954. In the same year he declared a state of emergency to put down a strike of railway firemen. In 1955 he passed the Public Order Act, (Maintenance) Act, which began the era of detention without trial. He deported Kaunda and other African leaders and he implemented the Land Husbandry Act, depriving many Africans of their land. These repressive measures must be seen as a reaction to the rise of the educated African nationalist in the 1950's.

Sanctions are not just seen by the Rhodesians in the light of their economic disadvantages. This is important but the Africans who suffer most from sanctions, unemployment has risen sharply, want them to continue despite economic hardship. What is probably more important, is that sanctions are a way in which white Rhodesians are cut off from their fellow-whites with whom they need to be linked - a ladder out of the black pit. The official Salisbury record of talks between Britain and Rhodesia, deplores the fact that negotiations took place against the 'dark and menacing background of sanctions'. Every flaw in the sanctions net is greeted with enthusiasm because it shows that the world really wants Rhodesia to survive. This is particularly true of the U.S' decision to allow sales of chrome. The influence of African action on this dilemma is seen by the fact that U'D'I' occurred after a period of steadily increasing black pressure both at home and in the rest of Africa. The failure of the whites to achieve a yes vote from the Africans during the 1972 Pearce Commission and the riots that occurred forced the black threat to the forefront and hence forced the Government to emphasise that it would not back down. They played down the proposals and did not press them.

As the whites have stepped up their oppression so it has become essential for the people of Zimbabwe to wage their struggle on two fronts. The first semi-legal, if harassed and oppressed, front is the African National Council, which was immensely successful in achieving a virtually unanimous No vote on the 'treacherous settlement proposals of Britain. Much more important however is the illegal Zimbabwe African National Union (ZANU), which has forced the Smith Government to fight in at least half the country. Smith has had to declare all the northern provinces free fire zones and establish strategic concentration camps for whole villages.

However, their ability to put their case and to get materials for their schools etc is strictly limited by their lack of printing facilities. They need our money now.

The Students' Association will be asked this week to contribute $200 to the A.U.S. fund for a ZANU printing press. In view of the urgency of the struggle for liberation in Zimbabwe, all students are urged to support this grant, and make a meaningful contribution to the fight for freedom in Southern Africa.

civilization, an example of the barbarity tribalism and inferiority of the African. On the other, it was the beginning of an African resistance which was to bring fear and eventually, permanent instability to the white population.

History from this dispossession point of view is the study of change in a form not in the substance. There can be here a clear division between past, present and the future; the past being the subject of history, the present the time in which it is written and the future a logical development in the same framework. Thus newly independent African nations struggle with the burden of an alien framework they have come to accept.

The division between history as defined by these static institutional studies and history centred around the study of popular movements and popular determination becomes immense in a colonial situation. The institutional approach becomes in the context of a liberation movement a structural extrapolation

As public servants, they said yes to the treacherous settlement proposals, which would legitimate Smith's government on its own terms, but they rejected the proposals as spokesmen of their peoples' opinions. The dispossession approach is liable only to see the public servant role of the chiefs.

Similarly, the Parliament in Rhodesia may be something completely different from what we see a parliament as being, but it functions as the elected lawmaker; even though it is a white parliament in a black country. A dispossession approach would see the parliament as a legitimate and worthy area of study, even though it is a repressive farce.

Another aspect of this approach to colonialism is its basis in the framework of regular, sequential time based upon a particular religious event in Palestine. The inappropriateness of this to African history is patently obvious. However, the imposition of this framework was a most important part of dispossession; Africans men and raping women and children in their traditional way. The Shona strangely enough, felt the whites were going to lose, so, to prevent Ndebele wrath, the Shona joined in to fight the whites. The whites won and to prevent further bloodshed, Rhodes courageously went unarmed to the 'barbarous' enemy. However, the fact is that this was one of the biggest and best organised rebellions in nineteenth century Africa. It was more successful, more organised, and involved more people than the Magi Magi in Tanganyika.

The major explanation is that there was grass-roots dissatisfaction over land and cattle and all were unified against a common recognisable enemy - the white man. It is one of the propagandists' favourite arguments that... when they came the land was mostly empty, the estimated population was half a million, and hence there was plenty of room for the Europeans. This shows a total disregard for the African, in that the African was cated black leaders were lobbying in England.

In 1923, Britain granted Rhodesia self-governing colonial status, and between 1923 and the 1950's, resistance was much less widespread, and concentrated in the African churches. However, resistance did continue, and grew after 1945 with the upsurge of the nationalist movement led by the educated and the young. This movement was built on grass-roots resistance. The Land Husbandry Act, which threatened to de-stock and break up tribal land and to prevent migrant labour from returning from the towns, met with such resistance that it was inoperative.

The repressive laws, despite the fact of some liberalization in respect to racial discrimination in the late 1950's, led to a rejection of participation in the white imposed government and the growth of mass parties. The movements were broad-based. This broad base was limited by the fact that the trade union movement was somewhat outside it because the National Democratic Party (the predeces-

It was also for this reason that the Rhodesia Front won. A favourite theory among liberal Western historians is that the change is due to a 'deterioration of white society' due to the fact that there was an influx of immigrants from South Africa and Britain who were lower middle-class and hence felt African job competition. Although there may have been some merit in this argument, the immigrants after World War One were also of the lower middle class and they similarly outnumbered the local community.

The bank robber next door — well he was not really a bank robber, because he'd never robbed bank but he would like to some day — was parading in front of the mirror gun in one hand, and a mask around his face.

She admired her body — after stepping from the bath, she was not to realize that the man next door admired it as well. She was not to realize that his admiration would eventually lead, to what she feared most.

He felt odd, almost funny sitting there in his mask; gun in one hand and a pair of binoculars in the other. It was through these glasses that he had first admired the children of the neighbourhood, but now he admired the woman next door. "Great tits" he would mutter to himself.

Her husband had never trusted her, he took her complaints about the man next door to be peculiar examples of lust. He never mentioned this as his own behaviour, lacked the fidelity that their marriage demanded.

Her complaints about the man next door increased about the same time as the number of dirty phone calls increased. She could see no relationship between the two, he however could. His suspicion grew as her description of the calls grew more graphic. It was not as though he found anything wrong with what he called obscenity.

The masked man was practicing in front of the mirror, he was however becoming tired of the idea of becoming a bank robber. He had been practicing for so long that the thrill had gone out of it, he longed for more. It was late in the afternoon when the idea of mountain climbing struck him.

She had had a bad day anyway, and now that he was hurt, because she didn't like his new boots, only aggravated her more. She could not understand why he would want boots with spikes on them anyway. It was not as though she insisted on everything being practical, even though she demanded it in her self. "Jill," she called, still no answer.

"Damn" she exclaimed, perhaps a little loudly as one of the neighbours looked up. Why were the neighbours here he kept asking himself was not the murder bad enough anyway. He had already arrived at the answer, not to the question about the neighbours, but the question about the murder of his wife.

The man next door was washing his mountain climbing equipment as they had become recently soiled. It was in the cool of the afternoon, when he was testing the strength of his ropes that the bell rang. It was not as though he was refusing to answer it, with this evaluation of the situation he was pleased.

The neighbours were still about, shaking their heads, muttering about how awful it all was, and wasn't there something they could do. He would smile, he would refill half-empty cups of tea. Though they all noticed, not a word was spoken, about how the spikes on his boots left marks on the carpet.

After her loud "damn", she was hesitant about going up to him, as the eyes of the neighbours followed her around. It was not as though she was unsure of what to do, it was just that it was all clear to her before. She was positive that his eyes were dancing. Dancing to the tune that was called by the neighbours.

The man next door was leaving the cupboard, when he noticed that the sun was coming up, he reached for his binoculars when he remembered. Though the image of the mountain climber was new, it was beginning to pall. He was faced with the struggle for something new. Though the thought of being an accountant was unrealistic, he decided that he could relax into such a position.

One of the neighbours commented that it was strange for a man whose wife had just been murdered, to go out and buy a new suit. Even if the suit was a conservative one. He felt good as he relaxed in the suit. He could see nothing strange in a change of appearance, especially after what had happened, and besides she liked it.

The police were beginning their investigation, the man next door had noticed them through his binoculars. He had found a new use for them. He had never shown a great interest in most of his neighbours, and they were quick to point this out to the inquisitive policeman. The man next door could tell that they were talking about him, for each time the woman across the road said something that the policeman thought was significant he would turn his head around and briefly glance at his house.

The policeman was bored, he was no longer surprised with his boredom, initially he had been. For he had joined the force, for the same reason as many, for the excitement. It was not that he expected it to be exciting in itself, but as an alternative to the job he had. A trainee accountant. Now that he was bored with this job, he often reflected, as to how good it would've been to be an accountant.

imperialist a.n.u.

... we who live in the dominions of the British Commonwealth have serious reason to be thankful of the fortitude of the Victorian women of Britain who bore their numerous progeny without obvious complaint and who helped thereby to lay the foundation for a mighty Empire.

— W.D. Borrie, Professor of Demography, Australian National University, in his Population Trends and Policies: A Study in Australian and World Demography, pp. 3-4.

... the United States and Japan stand at the apex of the hierarchy of economic development. They draw resources from the next tier, Australia, Canada, and New Zealand, while selling goods in these markets. These advanced countries, moreover, regard the integration of the neo-colonial countries around the Pacific Rim into their triangular and quadrilateral economic relations as essential to the future development of an international division of labor in the Pacific.

— Peter Wiley, "Vietnam and the Pacific Rim Strategy", Leviathan, June, 1969.

There was considerable surprise two years ago when Gregory Clark, a post-graduate student at the ANU (and now Tokyo correspondent of The Australian) made a blistering attack on the Department of International Relations at the ANU. His critique noted:

The Australian National University enjoys a unique position in Australia. It was established to provide an academic proximity for policy makers, and to some extent succeeds in this... Some may doubt the wisdom of academics playing this kind of political role, but it is probably inevitable. There is, however, a deeper question of principle. The timing of this particular conference [on India, Japan and Australia] was not accidental. It coincided with the first unhappy signs of US fatigue in Vietnam and a brief but interesting phase in Australian Foreign Policy when Canberra felt that a Japan/India/Australia anti-Communist and anti-China alliance was urgently needed as a substitute. It is doubtful whether a university has the right to divert research funds and lend its name for such obviously political ends.

The seminar to which Clark refers, and which provided the papers for the book which was the subject of his scathing review, was held in 1967 at the Research School of Pacific Studies within the ANU. By that year the high reputation of the ANU for liberal scholarship had taken a definite knock — especially after the huge eight-hour teach-in on Vietnam in 1965 when a number of its leading 'heavies' such as T.B. Millar and G. Fairbairn had come out as hawks on the side of Saigon and the USA.

Since 1967, however, the ANU's involvement in cold war politics, counter-insurgency warfare and military studies has grown in leaps and bounds. All of these developments make it timely to set out the trend taken by powerful elements within the ANU and to make an interim assessment.

First, consider events in 1971-72 alone:

(1) Economic Research Project on the Development of the Western

Pacific Region

Since it became clear that US troops would soon be kicked out of Asia the possibilities of non-military economic penetration have been canvassed by US and Japanese commercial interests. Professor H.W. Arndt of the ANU, one of the Federal government's key advisors on Australian economic policy towards Indonesia, has issued several warning signals in this regard. At an Australian Institute of International Affairs conference on Australia-Japan relations he counselled against the kind of idea put forward by Mr S. Naganos, president of the Chamber of Commerce of Japan, that Japan could invest in Indonesia, and the Pacific through transnational corporations. As financial writer Anthony Haas put it: "Mr. Naganos' interest extends to joint venture multi-national investment in Pacific Islands as well." At a Tokyo seminar on (of all things) "Socialism in Developing Economies" in May this year, Arndt was more ambivalent. On the one hand, he sternly warned that "if it is to overcome the bad image the Japanese understand they have in these countries — which might be mellowed by joint ventures with Australian or other countries' companies — Australia should view the matter with some caution." However, he added that he "would certainly not rule out cases where Australian and Japanese companies might combine with local firms...but it is still not clear to me in which particular industries Australian companies could usefully combine with the Japanese. ...This is something the Australia-Japan Business Co-Operation Committee could usefully investigate."

However, two other institutions are filling out the information gaps to which Arndt referred. His "Australia-Japan Business Co-Operation Committee" met in Kyoto in May, 1972, but the initiative passed to the Five Nation "Pacific Basin Economic Council" which met in Wellington in May and to the ANU in April. It was announced that the Federal government would contribute $15,000 a year to an ANU Research Project on Pacific Basin Development, but that most of the work would be supported by ANU finances. The Australian group is to be led by Sir John Crawford of the ANU, while Dr Saburo Okita of the Japan Economic Research Council will head a team of Japanese economists. The Minister for Foreign Affairs, Mr Bowen, welcomed the project, which had been discussed between the ANU and the Federal government's standing interdepartmental committee on Japan. Bowen said the project would be "independent", and that "economists[] in both countries have pressed for closer regional aid co-operation in developing countries and more joint manufacturing ventures." The terms of reference for the ANU project are (a) "the potential for growth and trade in the Western Pacific" and (b) "the role of the major Western Pacific countries, particularly Japan and Australia." Did someone mention Australia and Adelaide ("the Switzerland of South Asia") were being offered as "launch-pads" and "springboards" for US and Japanese economic imperialism in South-East Asia? Did someone else coin the phrase the "Pacific Rim Strategy"?

The first group is Whitlam and Dunstan in action (of which more below); the second is the President of the Bank of America.

There was a quick "fall out" from this decision. Mr Gerry Gutman, a high official of the Department of External Territories (who had handled the Nauru phosphate royalties and independence negotiations as well as a number of New Guinea-Australia issues) announced his resignation. The reason — to set up his own company to advise American and Japanese and transnational corporations on how to get into the Pacific Basin economy.

(2) The ANU Centre for Natural Resources

The exploration of the Pacific economy requires transnational corporations to set up subsidiaries in Australia as their springboards. These will be in the first place mineral and mineral-processing industries, and light manufacturing. This requires resource knowledge. As part of the three-tier US-Japanese-Australian Pacific Rim Strategy it is also necessary to develop a stock or inventory of Australia's own natural resources. The point has been noticed by the Foreign Affairs Department — and the ANU. Both organizations announced during July that they would set up study groups on the problem. The Foreign Affairs Department's policy group is to be headed by Mr Roger Holdich which "is examining the possible implications of trends bearing in mind that Australia is a major supplier of many minerals already in short supply on the world market." The ANU promptly offered to match this by establishing a post-graduate Centre for Natural Resources in 1973. It gave as its reasons the need "to develop a resources policy which knew, or would establish where Australia was going, and how the exploitation of resources was to be controlled."

Apart from 1972 events we should also ponder some continuing elements, such as:

(3) The ANU on Bougainville
Many questions still remain unanswered about officially-approved ANU involvement in efforts by Bougainville Copper Pty. Ltd. to soft-soap Bougainville islanders into giving up their land and social customs, following the failure of the violence used in 1970 to attain whole process of its involvement, the Director of the Research School of Pacific Studies noted:

The Bougainville people are extremely resentful of past neglect, naturally enough suspicious of outsiders, and many are quite unconvinced by standard arguments that the benefits arising from the accident that this new-found wealth is on their land should go to the general good of the whole country...

Despite all compensation and all promises of benefits to come, the impact of this on the people devoted beyond all else to the land must be shattering...

Acting largely on the advice of Professor Douglas Oliver of Harvard and Hawaii, Bougainville Copper decided to engage in a large-scale effort to secure (such) information; and with this in view in 1969 approached Sir John Crawford with proposals for substantial grants to enable research to be undertaken by the ANU in the economic and social problems of Papua and New Guinea as a whole. This was accepted by the ANU Council in July, 1969, subject to the concurrence of the Faculty Board of the Research School of Pacific Studies; a sum of $30,000, over half the total was for the support of seminars and the journal New Guinea. The proposal was very carefully considered by the Faculty Board of the Research School in December, 1969, and unanimously accepted, subject to the important proviso that any report or publication arising from the study should be publicly available. The main sum involved was $18,000 for an intensive study of interacting social groups in the area immediately affected by Bougainville Copper's operations, and $10,000 for any ancillary special projects which might arise from it. In January 1970 the Faculty Board recommended the appointment, which was accepted, of Dr Eugene Ogan to carry out the intensive study among the Nasioi who live in the area affected by the company's operations.

The result of all such successful PR efforts by the company is that "the main beneficiaries of the Bougainville mine are likely to be the shareholders this part of the world better than any other country." This is probably untrue. American anthropologists, "transport specialists", "soil experts" and "specialists on shifting agriculture" certainly have spent more time on a micro-intelligence study of Thailand's rural areas than any other national group. Here, however, the trouble has been that "the reluctance of American academic specialists to assist in the programme is hampering Thailand's efforts to combat Communist insurgents."

Some ANU and other Australian academics have fewer such qualms. Since 1964 Professor R.S. Geddes of Sydney University and others have served as advisors to the Tribal Research Council — nerve centre of the counter insurgency anthropological surveys. The ANU's contribution to Thai studies has come mainly from E.C. Chapman of the Geography Department, and P.J. Rimmer of the Human Geography section in the Institute of Advanced Studies. Rimmer, a transport specialist, is known to be opposed to some aspects of "counter-insurgency" research. However, even his work had to take account of the all pervading atmosphere of such counter insurgency obsessions. As he noted:

there is increasing anxiety in government circles and among allies of SEATO that the Thai peasant farmer might be susceptible to external subversive influences exploiting his anxiety over economic problems and rising expectations, especially in the more depressed and neglected areas contiguous to the country borders. An effective transport system would enable the police and the military to respond quickly to recurrent insurgent acts in border areas near Burma, Laos, Cambodia and Malaysia.

One can only wonder at the lack of any official ANU policy statement, since as Professor O.H.K. Spate noted, "the question of subsidised research must always remain a delicate one," while as Pat Flanagan warned, "with the prospects of insurgency in the empire both abroad and at home, anthropology Ph.D.s are assured of ready work." However, once again, the major backdrop to the problem we are considering is the Pacific Rim Strategy itself. For as the Chase Manhattan Bank's Economic Research Division suggests, "Thailand promises to be an excellent investment and sales area for Americans if the rebel insurgency finance the Orientalists' Congress held at the ANU in January, 1971. It presented the organizers with a list of proteges, a limited number of whom were accepted, with the Asia Foundation paying for their fares. It will be recalled that this particular Foundation has been kicked out of Ceylon and Burma and were ordered off the University of Philippines' campus in 1969. (They are back again there, in company with Ford, in the person of Father Frank Lynch, an American Jesuit at the Ateneo.) The Asia Foundation admitted in 1967 that it was the recipient of CIA money.

It also appears that the RAND Corporation is developing an interest in the work at the ANU. A representative attended the closed seminar on "Asia and the Pacific in the 1970's", while on 15 June, 1972, the President of the RAND Corporation, Mr Henry S. Rowen, interviewed the Centre for Strategic Studies and the Department of International Relations. (Rowen had been Deputy Assistant Secretary for Defence in the Kennedy Administration.)

We can only speculate on these influences, or indeed on American interference at the ANU generally. It is not known if former CIA chief Richard C. Helms did not visit the campus during his unpublicized stopover in Canberra this year. On the other hand, Nixon's other aide, Mr John B. Connally, did meet ANU academics and underlined US interest in promoting Australia as a springboard for US investment in Asia and the Pacific. Connally "said he believed Australia was the dominant force in the Pacific Basin and this brought responsibilities which would impose all types of burdens."

It is possible of course that this idea came originally from E.G. Whitlam's 1970 speech to the US businessmen, but those with any inkling of the "duchessing" of ALP leaders in the US will have their suspicions as to which way the initiative lies in this case.

Whatever the pressure of Ford, a close study of the ANU's 1971 offering, Asia and the Pacific, based on papers given at a closed ANU conference of Australian-New Zealand-United States relations, gives us a clue to the mentality of those with a sudden upsurge of interest in the Pacific. Professor Hedley Br. J., for example, stated that while visiting New Zealand a few years ago, I myself came to feeling these ends.

Bougainville Copper Pty. Ltd. is a subsidiary of Conzinc Rio Tinto. The tiny island of Bougainville has been described as "the big jewel in the glittering Rio Tinto crown." What we know about the parent company has been set out in the book River of Tears: The Rise of the Rio Tinto Zinc Corporation by Richard West. His thesis has been adequately summarized by a fellow journalist as follows:
Uproar of a kind has followed the Rio Tinto trail round the world, from Britain to Rhodesia and South Africa, where RTZ has secret plans to mine uranium under a South African mandate in breach of a world court ruling. So far, the big firm has won every time.

One of the "big firm's" minor victories seems to have been the successful involvement of the prestigious ANU in its efforts. In a lengthy defence of the of RTZ...Bougainville wants to secede from Papua and New Guinea and more over it may well do so — with the backing of RTZ". So the ANU efforts may well fit into a Pacific Rim Strategy which has as its by-product the creation of economic development difficulties for an independent Papua-New Guinea. After all, the copper mines hold reserves of 1,000 million tons, which makes it larger than the entire Zambia copper-belt, hitherto regarded as the world's main supplier, while investment in the mine will be greater than all private investment in New Guinea over the last decade. Yet the ANU claims that its efforts add "new dimensions to intensive study, in view of the key significance of Bougainville to the wider problem of Nugini unity!"

(4) Anthropological Imperialism in Thailand
"The party line in Bangkok now," writes Stanley Karnow, "is that France knows can be contained."

At this point we may ask the reason for the virulent growth of an ideology of mini-imperialism at the ANU. Is it a result of pressure from the Ford Foundation? Is the ANU harbouring in its bosom candidates for Project Aggie? Or, on the contrary, is the ANU element close to neo-colonialist policy-makers intent upon turning the institution into an American-style academic backstop to new horizons of exploitation of the peoples of the Pacific Rim?

While the Ford Foundation is the main prop of the Strategic Studies Centre and the newly formed "Contemporary China Centre" (and the method of setting up the former in 1966 was of deep concern to more than the Quaker and liberal-left forces at the university), other foundations (and Hawker-Sidley) have been associated with the funding of the university's research efforts. One of these is the Asia Foundation which helped to something of a great power chauvinist. I remember feeling, while standing on a hill overlooking Wellington Harbour, something of the exaltation Hitler must have felt when he marched into Vienna in 1938 and claimed it was the Ostmark of the German Reich."

It is of course, important to survey these and similar attitudes amongst Australia's "expert" on international affairs and counter-insurgency. In connection with the ANU it is relevant to raise Nation's query about whether the growing relationship between academic researchers and government has "reached a point where the whistle has to be blown". Of more long-range significance, however, is the exposure of other bodies (such as the Australian School of Pacific Administration) concerned with suggesting Australian official versions of an economic and conceptual imperialism to be imposed on the Pacific Rim.

MAN
BOMB —See Insides

This photo was taken in the "waiting room" outside the University Stealth Service which was especially built to facilitate the study of the delayed action pill on student volunteers. This anonymous subject shows the severe withdrawal symptoms common in some students.

In an announcement early this morning from the Department of Stealth the Director General Sir William (Ref:shaging) said that tests on the new male contraceptive pill—the delayed action pill—had finally come off to his satisfaction.

The Director General was commenting after several months of exhausting testies on random clusters of university students and a control group of upyer echelon public servants. 'The outcome of the tests have been warmly received and were true to schedule', Sir William said.

The announcement was provoked by consternation in medical circles, environmental societies and the R.S.P.C.A. which had aroused doubts in many branches of the Waterside Workers Union about the future effects of 'the delayed action pill'.

The D.A.P., which is expected to be released on the market shortly, is taken orally by the expectant male three hours before intercourse begins and a second pill is taken two hours before intercourse is completed. For the purposes of this pill completion of intercourse is taken to begin with the first and end with the last pulse of the orgasm. Under the influence of the pill the male perceives a normal orgasm although no seminal fluid passes immediately from the body.

Professor I.O.U. Lurch and Dr N.B.Footnote, scientists who cracked many of the problems of the prototype pill, stressed in a specially arranged seminar for advertisers and promoters of the D.A.pill that withdrawal of the penis must take place immediately after the beginning of the end of the last pulse of the orgasm which marks the end of the completion of intercourse i.e. the beginning of the 'chung' part of the 'Kha-chung' that is the last pulse.

The advantages of this method of contraception are not immediately obvious they said. 'However', said Professor Lurch, 'it is 99.1% safe if directions are followed immediately after purchase; post intercourse comfort is maximised and the life expectancy of bed linen is increased.'

Disadvantages include total abstinence from sexual intercourse for the male until delayed discharge of seminal fluid occurs. This can happen any time between the beginning of the end of the last pulse of the orgasm and 235 hours later.

Dr G.A.Wonder-Howe, an executive member of the A.M.A., condemned the pill outright as being contradictory. 'The environmental Society', said Mr A. Lamist, director of the Everything is Beautiful Advancement League, 'believes the D.A.P. to be both pricocious and a danger to the ecology of the scrotum.' The President of the R.S.P.C.A. Mr Ted (Bowsie) Wowsie said people had to learn to accept haploid individuals as dumb animals. 'Just think of the misery wrought on millions of sperm not knowing whether they are coming or going for period up to 235 hours. It's scandalous', he said.

The 'Piss Weekly' was told yesterday by a spokesman of the Waterside Workers Union Mr P.O. Liner that his union had been instrumental in setting up a Senate select Committee to enquire into the effects of the delayed action pill. Reports from Canberra later confirmed that Senator Gay Lib., Victoria and Senator Mannual Labour, South Australia, two members of the Select Committee who have sampled the pill, ejaculated before prayers in the House three minutes ahead of schedule.

Other sections of the Community have been affected by repercussions perpetrated by delayed action pill takers. Mr Richard (Tricky Dicky) Ref:shaging, President of the ANUS Association and off shoot of Sir William was forced to lodge a formal complaint to the Stealth Department on behalf of his members. Some University students directly involved in delayed action pill trials have developed severe withdrawal symptoms. Dr Fernarse of the University Stealth Service who is making a special study of this syndrome and its relation to academic success wrote in an advanced abstract reprinted in

VICE QUEEN RAIDED

Sydney Vice-Squad detectives raided a King's Cross premises last night, arresting a woman suspected of being a keeper of a disorderly house. She was alleged to have been a well-known Sydney Vice-Queen.

The raid took place last night as police descended on the area. A police spokesman said that the raid was carried out by the Vice-Squad after they had received information which led them to believe a disorderly house was being operated in the area.

A local resident said the proprietor of the house was a well known woman. The woman, believed to be a notorious Sydney Vice-Queen, was taken into custody and subsequently interrogated by detectives from the Vice-Squad.

She was arrested in the raid made on premises last night when the police followed up information relating to the well-known King's Cross area of Sydney. The woman was well-known in the area and was known by the police.

The reason police gave for the raid was the information had been circulating for some time that a disorderly house was being kept in the area by a notorious Sydney Vice-Queen. The police spokesman further claimed last night that, during the raid, "We arrested a woman whom we believe to have been in charge of the house." A statement could not be obtained from another senior police spokesman last night because he was on holidays the police spokesman explained.

The woman arrested was detained for questioning.

Further information has not been forthcoming as the Police have indicated that they would not release any statements other than those issued subsequent to the raid last night on premises in the King's Cross area last night in which the alleged Vice-Queen was arrested.

She will be charged with keeping a disorderly house. Police sources acknowledged last night. The police asked journalists to refrain from giving details of the raid as they did not wish to alarm members of the public in the well-known King's Cross area of Sydney unduly.

"There is nothing for the public in King's Cross to be alarmed about" a senior Police spokesman told journalists last night after the raid and subsequent arrest.

BREAKING IN CROSS

Detectives from the Breaking squad are investigating complaints made by a well-known Sydney woman that a number of men broke into her King's Cross premises last night.

Police sources requested the public to be on the lookout for a group of men dressed in blue acting suspiciously in the area.

ROUGH STUNTS

The Monster for the Interior, Mr Rough Stunt, claimed today that "outsiders bent on violence" were responsible for the riots and injuries at the moving of the Aboriginal Embassy, and that this was why 100 Aborigines and only two whites had been arrested. "At least six policemen have been taken to hospital with broken fingernails," he said, "and only one of the demonstrators, Harold Peaceful, who will be buried tomorrow, was slightly injured in the scuffle."

Fighting is believed to have broken out shortly after 200 ACT Police, with tear-gas, guns, tanks, anti-riot weapons and whistles had arrived at the scene, and had gathered together to listen to amplified tapes of German Political Speeches, 1939-41, before wading in.

"We tried to play the whole thing down," said Mr Stunt, "the Police had been telling me for some time that they expected everyone to come quietly." Speaking from his office at Territory Real Estate Pty.Ltd., he commented, "Why these people want to camp out in the middle of Canberra's winter, breaking the law, which I sneaked into force this morning without letting anyone realise, I just don't know. Why, my government is prepared at any time to build them a nice little Leagues Club at Fyshwick, where they can carve boomerangs and go walkabout to their heart's content. Why don't the black bludgers just piss off from my Parliament."

The former Prone Monster, Mr. G.G.Gorgon, was later asked about a statement he had made in office concerning interference in the Queensland Black Acts: "I've interfered with abos before" he said "not only in Queensland but all over the country, and so help me, if they start getting uppity I'll damn well interfere with them again."

And as he waved his white tool of legislative power at our interviewer the Aboriginal Embassy was torn to shreds by police dogs.

DEAD TROUPE

Fifty members of the world-famous Canadian dying troupe arrived today for a once-only performance of their spectacular stage act in the Canberra Theatre. The troupe, led by the acclaimed Laszlo Mort, will give probably the most polished dying exhibition ever to be seen in Canberra. The performers have studied in various Asian academies and have gained experience in places as varied as Dachau, Biafra, Vietnam and Vancouver. Mr Mort himself studies for 3 minutes under the famous Italian dying genius, Mussolini, whose death was a world-acclaimed success.

We talked with Mr Mort about various recent deaths and asked him what the thought of Australian Harold Holt's underwater death. Mr Mort's reply seemed clouded with professional jealousy. "The idea of dying underwater was original. But it was a very overrated death - if it was a death at all. After all, where was the corpse? The most I can say about it is that it was the best stage managed death I've heard of. I wish my manager had as much professional acumen as Tony Eggleton.

"Now look at the My Lai death festival. That was a professional job. Calley couldn't have done it all himself. I'd say he'd been working with planners for several weeks. It was beautifully carried out. There was a style and panache in the glorious child mutilations and those pre-killing rapes of the women. Even the New York Times gave it a 4-star rating.

"But that episode shows the danger of getting in on the political death scene. It'd be absolute suicide for my troupe to give up the easy life of show business deaths for the political stuff. I mean there's more money to back you with political deaths, but you wouldn't know where you stood. This Calley gave the most exciting death show in decades and the only reward he gets is to be put into prison. Where's the justice in that?"

Their Town Hall stage act will include all the traditional dies plus several that Laszlo's group have made famous. Just before the first interval the specially imported Kessler Twins will perform the world premiere of the complex and dangerous tandem death.

The climax of the evening comes at midnight when Laszlo Mort himself takes the stage to attempt the legendary Chinese tortoise die, in which he is shot 3 times through the elbow, stabbed twice with an umbrella, thereby disemboweling him, set alight by a tribe of African pygmies, trampled over by a herd of stampeding wart hogs and eaten by Jackie Gleason. The audience is expected to die laughing.

SNIFFA LICKS EM ALL

Sniffa, the under-dog, an Australian mongrel terrier accidentally baited, trapped and nailed in a heavy wooden box, and sent to India, was jubilantly reunited with his owner at the North Head Quarantine Station dog kennels today. Sniffa, who can't stomach canned food, has been living on a diet of top-quality steak and leper's droppings, and has been returning from India aboard the New Zealand freighter, Helicidic, on which he has been sharing a cabin with the first mater.

"Only the best meat for my Sniffa," said Sniffa's owner, pretty young widow Janet Dogsbody.

It is now almost 3 months since Sniffa was sent to India along with 3 cans of preserved apricots, two yards of plastic sheeting and a brood of Cistine Nuns, by ever-vigilant Red Cross worker, Father Dan Zealous, who claims he mistook the sleeping Sniffa for a parcel of sausages for refugees. Miss Dogsbody, who comes originally from Boston, and who now works a massage parlour at the back of a Veterinarian's Surgery at Bondi, said at the time:

"Sniffa is worth more to me than all the Jews in China. If I don't get him back I don't know what I'll do with myself, to say nothing of what I'll do with the 200 tons of Sniffa's steak stored in the cellar of our North Shore home."

Sniffa's plight brought a wave of reaction from dog-lovers all over the country, and after a massive public donation campaign, enough money was gathered to scour the sub-continent and rescue Sniffa from the clutches of the skinny pack of Bengali scoundrels bent on making of him a ritual sacrifice-cum-barbeque. When Janet went down to the harbour to meet Sniffa today, she took with her a special surprise; the half-decomposed remains of her father Ted, dead from distemper and flea-bites shortly after Sniffa disappeared, and to whom Sniffa was particularly attracted. Sniffa greedily gobbled up the remains and then pissed on Janet's leg, bringing a tear to everybody's eye.

Quarantine regulations, would normally have imposed total annihilation of Sniffa, who contracted typhoid, leprosy, rabies, foot-n-mouth disease and a bad cold during his stay in India, but have been lifted for our friendly four-legged friend in an act of governmental generosity which goes unsurpassed in the whole history of Australian welfare.

While in India Sniffa developed a taste for starving refugees, and as we left the Quarantine Station where Janet is to eat, live and sleep with Sniffa for the next 6 years, we could see an ever-so slight tear falling from Janet's nose, which was ever-so slightly falling from her face, and Janet made this impassioned public appeal:

"Please help me keep Sniffa alive," she said. "Refugees are expensive to get, and they're not much of a meal, really - it takes 10 of them to make a normal steak. Just remember that only 20 cents will feed Sniffa 5 refugees a day for a year; for 40 cents you can feed Sniffa a whole Indian family. And 60 cents will keep him in Chocolate Leper Crumble for a month."

The first mate of the Helicidic said that Sniffa had taken the dirty passage from India "without a murmur".

Picture shows Janet and Sniffa playing leap-frog.

BURLEY MONSTER

comes from lake

Our staff photographer was wandering around the site of a new freeway-carpark complex by the lake the other day when he spotted Carol riding around on this monster.

The monster was first reported in 1965 soon after the lake filled up. CSIRO carried out an extensive investigation but could find nothing to substantiate rumours of a monster's existence.

Carol claims she has been riding him (she calls him Jim) for several years but has kept it a secret because she fears publicity will keep Jim away. Jim is shy: Carol has been trying to get Jim to ride her for some time but has not had much success.

Jew Brickie at Mascot

Famous Jewish brickie at Mascot.

Among arrivals at Mascot yesterday was the noted deity, God. He is here to promote his latest best-seller, 'The Bible' which is published in hardback edition and retails for $10. It is a follow up to his first book, the 'Guide to Eating Places in Palestine.'

God recently attracted attention when he was named as co-respondent in a Nazareth divorce scandal involving a carpenter's wife named Mary.

While in Sydney, God will be staying in King's Cross. 'Jesus talked a lot about it,' he said. 'He was always hanging round the Cross'. We asked God about his Red Cross blood donor badge. 'It's those fool priests dressed as nurses. They're always after my blood for ceremonies.' God expressed displeasure at the publicity the Pope is giving the 'Bible.' He keeps confusing encyclopedias with encyclicals. I'm thinking of sacking the fool and hiring Harry M. Miller as Pope.'

Chapter One of God's book, Genesis, is a blueprint for aspiring world creators. God modestly claimed today that it is the best of all possible worlds. He also denied that he rested on the seventh day. 'I was on strike,' he says. 'I wanted parity with the wages of sin.'

Short Sighted

Positive medical evidence has now been found to support the age-old truism that masturbation causes blindness. Leading Canberra doctor, Fred Mornam, announced this fact to the AMA (Australian Masturbators Anonymous) yesterday. Mr Mornam, wearing glasses and tripping over spectators' feet on the way to the rostrum, cited the case of Mr Hand, a 90 year old pensioner.

Hand has been masturbating since his wife's death 20 years ago, Mornam claimed, and is now partially losing the sight of one eye.

He has called up the Senate Select Committee to investigate Blindness to outlaw masturbation. However, all the Senators are short-sighted and most have been seen to have their hands in their pockets.

Oldies

In figures released by the Bureau of Statistics last night, it was revealed that the average man has suffered an age rise of nearly one year since the last survey in July 1971. This has been the greatest rise in Australian recorded history. The Minister for Old Boy said that there should be no real cause for alarm. 'This is quite in line with overseas age trends, but we are hoping for a downtrend next year. The government will be keeping a strict eye on the situation, in case it should get out of hand.' However, the shadow opposition Minister stated that the Australian public would no longer put up with rampant age inflation, and that in light of the coming election, the government 'ought to do something about it'. He said that the lack of regulation is a serious threat to our standard of living, and a rise in age would have a crippling effect on social services.

WOGS GREASE WAY

A survey made public today indicates that the normal Australian is more informed about the cultural oddities of New Australians than most people suppose. Mrs "Dinky" Di Riddle, of Bigot Survey Enterprises, working on behalf of the World Organization for Golden Greasy International Ethnic Societies, or WOGGIES, said today that a questionnaire she had conducted throughout the pubs and RSL clubs of the country, indicated that spags, boongs and jews were accepted into our normal human society with a characteristically ready Australian humour. Asking the following questions Mrs Riddle got, and recorded, the following answers.

Why do the Jews hate the Germans? They sent them the gas bill.
 How do you tell Egyptian sewers from Australian sewers? By the diving boards.
 What is the most dangerous job in Italy? Riding shotgun on a garbage truck.
 Why are Synagogues round? So you can't hide in the corner when the plate goes around.
 How do you break an Italian's finger? Hit him in the nose.
 Why do Jews have big noses? Air is free.
 What is yellow and goes cheap, cheap? A Chinese prostitute.
 Why are there no Italians in Rhodesia? Because of the oil embargo.
 Why do Jews have dirty feet? Because they are terrified of shower rooms.
 Who has a long dirty white flowing robe and rides on a pig? Lawrence of Italy.
 Who won the Lebanese beauty contest? No-one.
 Why do Italians sleep in the gutter? So they can get breakfast in bed.
 What is the smallest book in the world? "The Humour and Wit of the People of Germany."
 What is an Italian doing if he has both hands up in the air? Training for World War III.
 Why don't they give Maltese workers ten-minute tea breaks? It's too costly to retrain them.
 Why do Italian tanks have one forward and four reverse gears? In case they get attacked from behind.
 What do you call a Greek restaurant? A fish and shits shop.
 Why don't you offer an aborigine a tip? Better housing doesn't interest them.
 What's the smallest book in the world? The Polish Who's Who.
 What is red, white, blue, yellow, pink, green, and purple? A Pole dressed up.
 Why do Italians always have garbage in their pockets? For identification.
 Where's the safest place to hide a $5 note in Italy? Under a bar of soap.
 What do you call six Poles standing in a circle? A dope ring.

What's the smallest book in the world? Egyptian and Italian war victories and heros.
 What is the biggest book in the world? "Famous Polish Axe Murderers".
 Why are Jewish women fat? Saves money on maternity gear.
 What do you call a seven pound Biafran? Fatty.
 What do you call a ten pound Biafran? Nigerian spy.
 What is the smallest book in the world? Hungarian Rules and Etiquette of Business.
 Why are there no Croatians in Long Bay? There's no room - it's full of Serbs.
 How was the Grand Canyon formed? A Jew dropped five cents down a rabbit hole.
 Why are there no aborigines at University? They don't need a Ph.D. to carve boomerangs.
 What do you call an Italian who marries a pig? A social climber.
 Why do so many Sicilians go home? So they can be murdered on home ground.
 What's a Greek barbeque? A fire in a garbage bin.
 How do you get 24 Jews into a V.W.? Throw in five cents.
 How do you get 24 Jews out of a V.W.? With a juice extractor.
 Why are there more Italians in Melbourne than aborigines in Sydney? Sydney had the first choice.
 What do you get when you mate a gorilla with a Greek? A retarded ape.
 Why does an Italian coffin have only two pall bearers? Because a garbage tin has only two handles.
 What would be a description of 250 Lebanese paratroopers? Air pollution.
 How do you get the Italians out of your backyard? Take the garbage cans out the front.
 Why does the Pope wear underpants in the shower? So he won't have to look down on the unemployed.
 What do you get for throwing petrol bombs in Ireland? About ten protestants per gallon.
 What do you call someone who reads this article in its entirety? A bigot.
 How do you drown an Italian? Pull the chain while he's drinking.
 How do you tell when an Italian's drowned? By the oil slick on top of the water.
 How do you give your car a grease and oil change? Run over an Italian.
 What is the difference between a wog and a bucket of shit? The bucket.
 What is the Arabian national flag? A white cross on a white background.
 What is the Italian national bird? The fly.
 What is a garbage tin on a trolley? Meals on wheels for Italians.

BUSINESS THIS WEEK

The former director of the world's largest Bull-Shit concern, Liberal Liars Co. Pty. Ltd., was today jailed for life for making a true statement to the public.

The statement was "I don't know," which the former director, Mr Bill Mc Money, let slip at a press conference some months ago.

The statement is believed to have had a widespread no-effect-whatsoever-on Liberal shares, which had already reached an all-time low.

The new director of the company, Mr Sly Snedley, said today that although there was something approaching a glut in the Bull-Shit field, it was expected that his company would corner the market before November.

Talking of his company's resources and exploration he said, "We have just discovered a new vein of raw material with which we can work, and it can certainly be made into a good old load of Bull-shit."

The announcement of the expansion of Slum Tenements andhovels Pty. Ltd., a division of Poverty Enterprises, builders of Canberra's Causeway, was greeted in government circles today with stunned apathy. When interviewed about the matter the Prime Minister said, "I have been informed of the matter and I promise that I will discuss it in secret with my Cabinet before I make no announcement and decide to ignore the whole thing."

A spokesman for Slum Tenements, Mr W.C. Wantnought, who is also the Minister for Social Injustice, said that his company's expansion was made possible only by "the consistent pursuit, in government economic policy of high-tax and a pool of unemployment."

"Canberra needs a nice belt of sub-human dwellings if it is to keep up with the latest overseas trends" he added.

All trading in normal shares was suspended today while stockmarket employees chalked four letter words and lude drawings on the boards. Phallic Symbols rose slowly before a sudden collapse after an erratic climax. Bums, too, featured prominently on the stock exchange floor, remaining steady throughout symbols downward plunge.

By far the most popular were Erotic Fantasies which attracted attention by freely distributing dividends in the public gallery. A spokesman for a rival concern, Dirty George Raffiti, of Toilet Wall Scribbles, said that his group was making a take-over bid for Erotic Fantasies and that from now on he was offering ten lavatory limericks for every three erotic dreams. "Sexual fantasies must be kept within the bounds of the toilet", he said. "If they become openly known in business society, the whole Filthy Wall Trade could collapse".

the students newspapers "Woroni" that he had observed withdrawal symptoms to last as long as 235 hours in some students. "There was a strong correlation with this protracted condition with obesity" he said.

Female members of the University have complained bitterly at the scarcity of sanitary napkins in the women's ablution block. Miss Pussy Parker told the Weekly that she was bowled over for most of the afternoon as several male students pilfered all the napkins from the dispenser. In an attempt to curb this irresponsible behaviour Richard Ref:shaging called a general meeting to move a motion calling for a sanitary napkin vending machine to be installed in the mens lavatory in the Union. The students overwhelmingly supported the motion and called on the law firm of Mr U. Mac Phillime and Mr I. Mac Phillyou to investigate the legal implications. Mr C. deSlooth and Mr Bill Peckhard abstained from the floor.

The delayed action pill is the brain child of Queanbeyan businessman Mr Guss Forth. The Weekly spoke by telephone to Mr Forth right after the Director General made his announcement. Mr Forth withheld all comment although he was forthcoming with a prepared statement. "He was over-come". Speculation was rampant before this issue went to press that Mr Forth would be the successful tenderer for a research position in the Dept. of Stealth to assist in the development of cerebral contraceptive devices.

Bigger Drug Haul

ONE MILLION TABLETS SEIZED.

A sudden police raid in the suburb of Panania, today, exposed a drug ring of housewives and led the police drug squad to the manufacturer of the drug.

The Drug Squad quickly closed in on the manufacturer and seized over one million tablets believed to be acetylsalicylic Acid.

Police are now in the process of rounding up the pushers who are located in many of Sydney's suburban shopping centres.

The discovery of the ring was a lucky break as a result of a police sergeant spotting three seemingly harmless housewives taking tablets at a Rugby League football match. A Police Spokesman said to this reporter: "Rugby League matches lead to so much tension that housewives can be enticed to use Acetylsalicylic Acid to relieve the strain.

"We are following a belief that use of this drug may lead to the use of harder drugs such as Ascorbic Acid."

Police tailed housewives to a party in Panania where every person used the drug.

The Police spokesman told me that such suburban drug parties are common.

From this party, police were also led to a supplier who told them the name of the manufacturer who is believed to use the alias "A.P.C."

Over thirty people were arrested in Panania and nearly twelve pushers have been uncovered.

Woolworths check-out operator, pretty and intelligent like her 63 predecessors, Miss Sweetiepie Money, cried with joy this week when she was announced Miss Check-Out (Australia) 1972. Our reporter this week directed a few questions at Miss (Check-Out) Money after her magnificent win.

Was your win magnificent, Miss Money?

Check
It must have been! Why did you enter the competition?

Cheques
I believe your dress was a magnificent creation by a Czech designer. What was the design?

Check
Some people believe that you won the quest by repeating only that which each of your 63 predecessors have said before you. Is that true?

Check
(losing cool) No prizes for originality. Check? (smart bitch)

P.S. To be eligible to enter for Miss Check-Out (Australia) entrants must be pretty, intelligent, have a broad-mind (not necessarily broadened by their job. This role was relaxed in 1965 when there was a "squeeze" in check-out broad-minds), be able to speak intelligently in sentences less than 2 words and ultimately be able to check out 2 medium-sized carrots, 33 peas, 10 slices of bread & vegemite, 2 ladies singlets, a pair of jockettes, 3 shop walkers and a floor manager - all in less than 5 seconds.

Time To Check Drivers

Any time is the right time to take stock of your screwdrivers and you will probably find some of them, chipped, bent or in some other way distorted. Tools like this, can be, and often are, a nightmare for the handyman. A few minutes is all that is needed to put them back into useable order.

They should be ground back into correct shape on an emery wheel or grindstone. The edges should be smooth and even, and the faces near the ends parallel to each other.

If this is not done precisely the screwdriver probably will slip at the crucial moment. It should be remembered that a faulty screwdriver not only damages the heads of screws, but is liable to jump the slot and tear a gaping strip out of the surface being worked on.

Homily Hints

Do you have trouble keeping your children busy? This is a simple way that they can help you with redecoration and stay entertained in their spare hours. Take any child under the age of 6, a can of plastic paint and an empty interior wall. Spread evenly. When child and wall are completely covered in paint, remove child. The result will be an abstract mural 3 feet high.

My son, aged 2, has been saying "bum" to all our visitors for nearly a month now, and he can also vomit on the carpet. Can anyone else match this?

I used to cook spaghetti in the normal way, but my husband has given me a good idea. Now I put half the spaghetti in with one end out, and the other half in with the other end out. This way it cooks perfectly evenly all the way through.

CHEESECAKE: I have discovered an old recipe in my attic and my husband is wild about it. One cup of malt, 2 cups Spanish Fly, one spoon Cointreau, one cup Wonder Yeast, and 2 cups flour. Cook lightly and serve while hot and sizzling.

My husband had a very commendable plan for years before our marriage. He kept a glory box and filled it with all sorts of things that a young husband needs, such as tools and screws and other handyman's requirements. Then when we got married he opened it up and we were ready for anything.

VIETNAM FALLS TO GOOKS

Hardship on trail

PORT MORESBY: — The 5 Anglican Archbishops who are pushing one another up the Kokoda Trail each advanced another two inches yesterday; collecting 3 cents, several snakes, 2 leeches, odd parasites and a bag of beads for their charity, the North Redfern Church of England Girl's Basketball Club.

Each Archbishop has decided to devote his life to mounting and surmounting what lies in front of him on the old war trail.

The most senior of the group, the very Wethand Smartarse Groan, who is taking up the processions rear, and wearing his World War Two chaplain's battle dress, said that yesterday had been their most successful onslaught.

"We shot up 32 Japs dressed as black fellas", he explained with a grin, "and then scored a couple of collaborators from behind just before vespers".

As a gesture to God and Country the Archbishops have now decided to crawl up the trail in single file, kissing and praying at every inch of the long passage in front of them.

"It's a sweaty track to Paradise," grunted Groan.

— Red faces in Saigon

WASHINGTON, Thursday: Consternation struck Pedagogue officials just hours after the last U.S. serviceman had been withdrawn from Vietnam, when a red faced CIA undercover agent in the area cabled that many major cities had already fallen to gooks; — normally bigotted military sources announced today.

The cable is reported to have read, "Jesus, those slit-eyed son of a bitches are everywhere".

The announcement is believed to have caused considerable wide spread embarrassment in U.S. military circles. Major Trussee Ha-Ha, a considerably embarrassed widespread military servant, speaking on behalf of the Pedagogue, explained to the New Australian: "We have always maintained that a continued U.S. presence in the area is the only just and true way to suppress the ethno-gooko threat.

The invasion is believed to have taken place in countless waves simultaneously up and down the country, under the air cover of South Vietnamese Yellow Horn-Billed Thrush and several grey clouds. Most cities have fallen without a shot and others are going down rapidly as displaced peasants believed to be gooks, flee the countryside for them.

In the meantime U.S. anti-war leaders have accused President

Nixoff of gross mis-deception, "We tried to tell the U.S. people for years that the South Vietnamese citizens were just people, said the protest singer, Joan Buggeryez, "but now that the Government has revealed that they were gooks all along we have nothing left to say."

One of the major calamities following the gook uprising has been the bloody slaughter of CIA agents (Crazy and Inept Assassins), all of whom, disguised as gooks, and standing out from the yellow crowds with their angered and embarrassed red faces, think that the whole thing is a communist conspiracy and have consequently been blowing up all the red faces they see, as fast as possible.

defence

This slaughter confirmed the worst fears of the President of the Australian R.S. Hole, Sir Billious Yahoo, who is now preparing to fight the gooks in his own front yard by planting a mine field under his front lawn and affixing a machine gun turret to his chimney. Sir Billious has already notched up a policeman, two pensioners, three dogs and a lawn beetle; claiming that gooks can disguise themselves as anything.

When asked what he would do if a gook attacked his mother, Sir Billious replied that he would whip down the TAB and put a dollar on Mum.

FORECAST: Gooks moving South to South Westerly. Estimated number: millions. The rest of Indo China should be fine and unsettled following the movement of U.S. clouds easterly.

Boxers Killed

Two boxers were killed in Canberra yesterday morning. This is the latest in a series of fatalities involving this sport. Those killed were Jim Welter (23) and Fred Bantam (25).

This is how the news has been received: Mr. Jim Dullard (47), an ambulance driver for the RSPCA. "There should be a law against this sort of thing; boxers, spaniels, dingoes—don't care what they are—they should be protected."

Dr. Ringo Jones (38), an A.N.U. historian: "This just can't go on for much longer, the boxers won't stand for it. You mark my words—there'll be another Boxer Revolution one of these days."

Mr. Lester Hype (56), A.C.T. Secretary of the Packers Union: "I've been saying all along that we don't get enough danger money."

"Last week we lost two wrappers the week before that it was a flap folder-downer. Now two boxers. And what is the Government doing about it? Nothing. Mrs. Betty Hensteeth (87): "Disgusting. I think its shocking that young men should be allowed to kill each other in this way. There are better ways you know."

Latest reports are that the two men were killed when their car ran into a tree growing in the middle of Commonwealth Ave. bridge.

Ping Pong

PARIS, Wed. — It was announced in Paris today that Australia had slipped from 26th. to 27th. place in the World Table Tennis rankings.

The fall was the direct result of Lower Mongolia receiving its first table last week.

Nine lower Mongolians have taken up table tennis and they are practising in a converted yak stable. They enjoy the ping but not the pong.

The gift was from China and this is looked upon by the Australian Table Tennis Association as a concerted effort for Communist domination of international

They're Aussies Now

They'll be dancing in their tin hovels, by the Tennant Creek rubbish dump, tonight, because today they were made full-blooded second-class Australian citizens in a naturalization ceremony in their home town. Pictured above, relaxing after the ceremony, outside the Tennant Creek Assimilation Centre, are Mr. and Mrs. A. Burryaboong who were each given a second hand copy of the Australian Constitution, and their two children who were each presented with a gold embossed copy of "The Guide to Australian Eating", which they ripped into little pieces and gobbled wolfishly. Now that they are legitimate second class citizens Mr. and Mrs. Burryaboong and family will be moving to live with their 43 cousins in their comfortable 3 roomed home in an inner Sydney suburb. Mr Burryaboong is looking forward to walking the streets, looking for jobs, scraping for food—and all the other activities which second class citizenship entail.

P.M. BASHED

CANBERRA: Thursday; The Primed Minister, The Right Wing Hon. Mr. William McMoan was attacked, assaulted and thrown in the water while walking with his Interior Minister on the shores of Lake Burley Griffen this afternoon, in the most politically sensational incident since a Molotov Cocktail, or perhaps just a cocktail was thrown at the toilet wall of the Lodge last Christmas; and the P.M.'s most physically harmful incident since he struck Nugget Coombs in the eye with a squash racket.

The incident is the latest in a series of Poofta Bashings. The officer in charge of the A.C.T. Police Poofta Assault Squad, Sgt. 1st. Class "Butch" Bolt (a tall heavily built man with a firm, thick jaw and powerful thighs) expects the bashing to be the work of long haired youths and perverts.

Panting, with water still dripping from his ears and orifices, the P.M. verified these expectations in a meet-the-press he gave soon after the attack, but added that one of his attackers was "particularly attractive—tall and well built, with a firm, thick jaw and strong thighs."

While the nation gasped in horror at Mr. McMoan's close brush with drowning, Cabinet decided on the following measures, designed to prevent further bashings, by imposing sanctions on homosexual movement in Canberra streets.

All known male homosexuals will immediately be rounded up by the A.C.T. Police, and will have the word "poofta" branded on their forehead. Anyone seen talking to or engaging clearing, and "poofta" is only allowed to be said in a derogatory manner, between mouthfuls of pie and beer, and at football club celebrations. Whenever a branded "poofta" appears on the streets he is to be viewed with looks of disgust and is to be treated as dangerously sick. In the meantime Mr. McMoan is to go away on a recovery camping trip with his Interior Minister.

Slav's Horn

BELGRADE, July 26th. (AFP)

A strange medical phenomenon has just been recorded in Zenita (Bosnia) where an octogenarian from the village of Doglodd, walked into a hospital to ask doctors to remove a 10 inch horn that had grown on the left side of his forehead.

According to his own story, this extraordinary peasant—a partial recreation of mythical monsters—first noticed his troublesome protruberance ten years ago and hid it first under a fez, the national headgear, but then as it grew larger, under a turban. He finally decided to resort to surgery because, he said, his horn kept him awake at night.

According to the Belgrade Press the operation was a complete success, and the horn was sent to the Museum of Anatomy in the Faculty of Medicine at Sarajevo, where doctors are at a loss to explain it.

Flower Power

NARRABUNDA residents were today shocked to learn that the Jerrabombie Jabber has struck again. Eighty seven year old Mrs. Magdalene Scudge was last night disturbed in her slumbers by what she described as a "noise".

Mrs. Scudge, wife of E.P. Scudge University Professor of Plant Pathology, told neighbours that she awoke to find a man in her garden.

The man, who had wild Nasturiums dribbling from his mouth, lunged at her Snap Dragon. She attempted to scream but he put a hand over her Magnolia. Mrs. Scudge told neighbours that this was the last thing that she could remember. It was "terrible", she said. She awoke to find a police man kneeling over her.

Police are looking for a prowler described as "dark and shadowy". They have appealed for the prowler answering this description to come forward, as they feel he may be able to help them in their enquiries.

However the Chief of the C.I.B., Inspector Nudge, admitted that they held out little hope of the prowler coming forward as recent developments in the case had led them to believe that he had hung himself on a clothesline as he fled.

Police are looking for a clothesline.....

Jack Nicklaus

Hi there! I'm famous professional golfer, Jack Nicklaus, and I write a short column in this paper each week because it brings me lots and lots of money, not to mention the satisfaction that I get from knowing that all you handicapped amateur boobies out there are trying to improve your golf with the bullshit advice that I make up.

Here's this week's: I always find that it helps if I fart while making a tee shot. It's all in the weight distribution. Just cock your left buttock while commencing the back swing; if you find this position a little difficult at first get your wife or partner to help you. And then, just before the head makes contact with your ball, let it rip. You'll find that in no time you'll become a champion bullshit artist just like me.

A man has been arrested at Yowani Golf Club on Ladies Day for removing all his clothes and folding them neatly in a pile after shooting his 9th birdie. His 10th birdie declined to comment after her withdrawal was announced, but it is believed that she didn't tee up well.

buggers lib

In one of the angriest demonstrations seen in Canberra for several hours a group of militant rugby buggers today burnt their jock-straps in protest against what they called the Rugby League Executive's "persistent failure" to recognize them as real human beings.

When questioned further about the protest movement, the ringleader, Drongo Dick Face, said "Eh? Wadchersay, you not puttin me on, areya, yabastard? Huh?" before spewing violently all over his young girl companion, vivacious Shiela Handsoff, of Bondi.

no balls

Australian fast bowlers Dennis Lillee and Bob Massie were reportedly "elated" after the London Times published a double-page spread of the two boys in the nude, both wearing cricket boots.

Team manager Ray Steele said the nude layouts had done much for the team's morale following the encounter with the Middlesex team last week which ended in confusion when Ian Chappell had declined to follow on. "They couldn't have chosen better men" he said "they are both terribly dedicated and experienced with the ball".

"We have had trouble making friends on tour" said the mustachioed Lillee speaking for himself and Massie, "that is, until now."

herd around town

Good news for Mr & Mrs Israel Goldstein of Acton. They had a phone call from their son Stewey on holidays from Med. School at the Palestine front, to say that he had finally decided that he was "bi." This was good news — only 2 weeks ago he had rung to say he was "homo", and had fallen in love with an Arab Sheikh. Mr & Mrs Goldstein were elated with the latest good news, it certainly was news, and it certainly was good. All the Jewish people about town say that it's "in" to be "bi" this winter.

Returning home after a relaxing week at Bateman's Bay are Garran family, Dr and Mrs Noel Panda, and their 8 healthy children. Fortisque, their mouldy, half-eaten, black, Jew-nosed crippled eunuch son, who was beaten and bound and gagged and locked in the tool-shed alongside the compost heap while they were away, is delighted to welcome home Gail, Gaylene, Gwenyth, Gwendolyn, Greg, Graham, Gary and Garth.

Mr & Mrs S. Orgy of Aranda have announced details of their new party game. All the ladies line up naked at one end of the room, and all the men line up naked at the other end; they advance slowly toward each other, and the neatest most correct entry wins.

Our staff photographer arrived just in time to snap former top Rugby League player Fondle Metitta and his fiancée Jane Brown just after Fondle, winner of this year's Jock Strap of the Year Award, had drunk champagne from Jane's shoe and had thrown up. They embrace for us below.

Miss Ada Giddup, age 97, visiting New Guinea this week with herself talks in her letters of the colourful natives who she says are wonderful people and are very happy. She talks in particular of one black highlander who showed her a long snake-like reptile which she had never seen before. "It got right underneath my skirts" writes Miss Giddup, who has cut short her story because she is putting on weight, and feeling a little sick in the mornings.

And it's good-bye, for quite sometime, to young Suzie Grinder, daughter of Mr I. Grinder of Lower Fyshwick; Suzie hasn't made an appearance on these social pages since her 21st birthday-cum-debut party when she was found lying naked across the front seat of an F.J., pissed out of her brain on sherry, with the gearstick in her mouth. Suzie will be spending some time in a Swedish clinic on her overseas trip

Mr & Mrs Gerald Boob tried to surprise their daughter Bertha this week at their Red Hill home, but she wasn't.

WHATS IT ALL ABOUT?

Sister Marjorie Baldwin is much of what one of ANU's bushweek charities is about.

Marjorie is the sister in charge of the Aboriginal Medical Service which is to collect 50% of this year's Bush week takings — the remaining 50% being for Hartley Street Centre for Physically Handicapped Children.

The medical service was established in July last year as part of an urgent community response to the need for something effective to counter the deprivations experienced by Koorie people living within Sydney's urban black ghettos.

The service set up with the help of Professor F. Hollows of the University of NSW is run on a daily basis by Majorie with the help of voluntary roster of 45 doctors who also remain on call in case of emergency.

Based in what was once an old 'fish & chip' shop the service deals with problems such as malnutrition — which leaves 9 out of the ten children who come to the centre having watery eyes, running noses, pot bellies or perforated eardrums which if not checked will lead permanent deafness.

The medical service runs a special children's day (Sunday) and runs a free food program for those suffering from the greatest diet deficiencies.

Contraceptive and family planning advice is given to all those asking or needing it — Marjorie explained that no one was refused contraceptives with the simple statement that "if they're old enough to have children then they're old enough to have contraception". Koories in need are driven to the service by voluntary drivers and the service is seeking a vehicle of their own — so far those companies approached have been rather reticent about supplying a car — it seems that affluent white school children who wish to learn to drive have 1st priority.

Marjorie starts work about lunchtime and works through until 11'm no longer needed" — which is usually quite late in the evening — an exercise which she confesses leaves her very little spare time to pursue her own interests and social life.

Typically what time she has is being devoted to the Miss Australia quest — "to add a bit of colour, to publicize the centre and to raise money for both Koorie and spastic children."

In her annual one week's holiday she visited the Aboriginal Embassy and ANU where she had a morning coffee with members of the Woroni staff — she explained that the Aboriginal population of Redfern were initially apprehensive about the service but now recognized it as belonging to them — "Like the Aboriginal Embassy it gives them pride that it is their own, it gives us a sense of identification and a sense of community".

Sydney however is not the only place where the medical centre operates as groups from the centre "go where asked" and hence periodically visit reserves offering and giving treatment.

Marjorie points out that as yet to her knowledge there were no Aboriginal doctors or Koories being trained as doctors and for that matter Koories rarely had the chance or the opportunity to achieve tertiary education. She grew up in Normanton in Queensland [Australia's Alabama?] which Marjorie described as "the most racist town I've ever seen." Now in Sydney and a trained double certificate nurse she claims she experiences very little personal racism. She says that the job and housing discrimination and the police repression Koories suffer from does effect her — as it often leads to emotional problems that the Centre with voluntary psychiatric help tries to counter.

The President of the Medical Centre is Koorie, Gordon Briscoe, who did a part-economics course at ANU two years ago and is now a field officer for the Aboriginal legal service as well as a National Tribal Council co-ordinator in NSW.

in the ACT

The A.C.T. Society for Crippled Children was founded with the aim of looking after the needs of children who attended the Canberra Hospital School. It served as a medium through which parents were able to consult with officers of the Department of Education and Science over the establishment of the Hartley Street Centre for Physically Handicapped Children in Turner. It continues to function, but in an enlarged capacity because the Centre includes a School and a Pre-School, with a present enrolment of about fifty children.

Who are the children attending the Centre? How are they selected? What schooling and treatment do they receive? What is their future to be? These are questions which concern the residents of the A.C.T. as well as the parents of the children presently attending the Centre for they are questions of community concern.

The familiar process of birth is a dangerous one and the noted Australian gynaecologist Dr W.G. McBride recently stated that "5% of children are born with mental retardation and 2% have cerebral palsy." It is a fact of life, or birth, that children enter the world with disabilities which are not inherited, but are a result of incomplete medical knowledge and ability to deal with the hazardous process of birth. In the A.C.T. there are three institutions which cater for the special needs of some of these children: Koomari Malkara, and the Hartley Street Centre.

hartley street

The Hartley Street Centre takes children who have physical disabilities and who are capable of being educated in the normal school system. Half of these children suffer from cerebral palsy, but children with a wider range of physical disabilities are treated; eg, muscular dystrophy and blindness.

It is now recognised that a physically handicapped child can overcome its disability if it receives a programme of therapy as soon as the condition is diagnosed. Early diagnosis is essential and a most important part of the Centre is the Pre-School, which at present has children as young as nine months. Enrollment in the Pre-School is recommended by an assessment panel after diagnosis or partial diagnosis of a suspected physical handicap by a medical physician. This panel continues to make assessments throughout the child's pre-school period to ensure that the child is correctly placed and is responding to treatment. The same panel considers placements in Koomari and Malkara so that over-all activities are co-ordinated.

The Centre provides the usual educational programmes of a normal school and it has a staff of teachers provided by the N.S.W. Education Department. Education is one function of the Centre. The other important function is therapeutic treatment by para-medical staff. This treatment can be broadly classified into physio and occupational therapy, and the staff are provided by Canberra Hospital. The Centre is very fortunate in having a dedicated and skilled educational and para-medical staff.

The programmes of therapy carried out by para-medical staff are a most important part of a child's development. The physiotherapists and occupational therapists concentrate on attaining the greatest functional ability of the child in the most normal way possible.

In the Pre-school, babies are taken prior to the age of three years, in order to give them every opportunity to experience as many normal situations as possible, these being guided and supervised by the therapists. Where necessary, muscles are strengthened and co-ordinated and the child is guided through crawling and walking, the more intricate upper arm activities and indeed, the over-all management of the child by parent is advised.

In older children, concentration is placed on balance and the attainment of normal sporting skills. Games, swimming and horse-riding all being part of regular weekly activities, the ultimate aim being the independence of a child, vocationally and at home.

Each child is constantly assessed during treatment and any particular problems which are in the interest of the child are discussed with the doctors and teachers concerned, thereby creating a close and thorough system of treatment.

The Centre is expanding rapidly and there is a continual need for funds to cover running costs and equipment for the children.

And so, dear readers, upright citizens with furled umbrellas and pulsating erotic fantasies, amused mothers, bored intellectuals, and fourteen year old school girls yearning for depravity, you might come at last to wonder why a select group of overworked students should while away their time thinking up, writing and otherwise plagiarising a hazardous collection of bawdy news send-ups. The simple one-word answer has been echoed through the annals of history: MONEY, glorious money, the key to life and social status, and the easiest means by which you can help this year's Bush Week Charities, the Hartley Street Centre for Handicapped Children, and the Aboriginal Medical Centre, in Sydney, to which all Bush Week profits will be forwarded. And if we may be deliberately serious for several hundred words, here are two articles on this year's charities.

pervs

In order to escape detection a man had dropped his excrement onto a police officer's face, the Canberra Court of Petty Sessions was told today. Appearing before Mr Pissen, Stupid Moron (S.M.), was Alfred Boldarse, a fitter and turner of Braddon. Sergeant McEye, giving evidence for the Crown, said that he had been on normal patrol lying submerged just below the surface of the water in a Garema place toilet bowl when the person now known to him as Boldarse had entered the cubicle, locked the door, and proceeded to remove his pants. The Sergeant said that he was about to burst forward and arrest Boldarse for indecent exposure when Boldarse had sat on the toilet seat, thus sealing the Sergeant's only means of escape, and had quickly gone about his dirty business. In his defence, Alfred said only: "I was in a hurry. I didn't know a policeman was behind me." Mr Pissen fined Boldarse R20 for exceeding the speed limit in the Garema Place toilets, and said that next time he committed this offence he would consider suspending his licentiousness.

An interior decorator and part-time male model was last night detained for questioning by A.C.T. Police after being found bying naked across the front seat of a parked car in Civic Central Car Park. Police became suspicious when they found numerous instruments in the vehicle commonly used for breaking and entering. A police spokesman revealed that the tools included a coca-cola bottle, two bananas, a bushel bag of carrots and a small bald man. Both men will appear in court today charged with hindering police in the execution of their duties. "People like these take all the thrill out of perving in car windows" commented one Sgt. McEye, of the Police Entry Squad.

smashed

Police last night released the details of another head-on-smash at the corner of University Avenue and Ellery Circuit. The heads involved were U. Groover and A. Freak. They were smashed on Indonesian hash.

missing

Early today there was lost, in the Garran area, a five-toed midget sloth with Parkinson's disease answering to the name of Shortie, who cannot exist away from insects for more than 49 hours. Canberra citizens with 8 legs and wings are advised to approach him with care.

An undercover agent from the Police Special Branch had been sent to investigate reports that marauding magpies were swooping on young girls and pulling out their pubic hairs. Inspector Fiddle, of the A.C.T. Criminal Penetration Squad, said that this was a last ditch effort; he added that nearly every member of the Police Force had been to inspect the damage, but had returned unsuccessful. It is believed that the Magpies are attracted by the glinting of the girls' pubes in the sun as they walk naked across the park to Domestic Science classes. Inspector Fiddle, the undercover agent, adjusting his beak and flapping his wings said: "This situation must be halted - there is no telling where they will go next - we must ensure the safety in this city of nipples, navels and underarm hair as much as pubes.

POLICEMAN OF THE MONTH

Constable Curly Shortarse (pictured below) has won this month's Lead Baton for Policeman of the month. Curly, nominated for the honour because of the extraordinary number of drunks and perverts he has been able to remove from Canberra's streets, finally won the award for being the only ACT Policeman able to string together a coherent sentence of more than 10 words. Curly's winning sentence was: "I was never really offended by the term 'pigs.'"

PRIZE RECIPES OF THE WEEK

Crappy Crumbles
A rich, chocolate-coloured biscuit wins first-prize this week for Mr Ian Handcock of Bruce Hall, ANU.

Preparation:

- 1 Take 3 fresh turds
- 2 Dry slowly in a moderate oven until turds are dry to the touch.
- 3 Grease biscuit tray with an animal's fat.
- 4 Remove turds from oven and allow to cool.
- 5 Take one turd and crumble between fingers into a bowl. Repeat procedure for the remaining turds.
- 6 Combine turds with tabls. milk and tsp. cinnamon.
- 7 Knead mixture until turds regain smooth consistency.
- 8 Pour mixture into biscuit tray.
- 9 Bake in a slow oven for 30-35 mins. Serve hot; makes 20 biscuits.

Molotov Cocktail

One of the more booming culinary successes to come from Northern Ireland in recent years is the Molotov cocktail. Guaranteed to make your dinner party go off with a bang, this simple concoction needs no shaking and is made according to the recipe below.

1. Take one can of petrol.
  2. Pour into an empty bottle.
  3. Seal bottle-neck with rag
  4. Light rag when ready to serve.
- Just throw a few of these around, and watch your guests go off their heads.

At last. Stereo for fidgets.

Up till now, listening to stereo has been tough for people who can't sit still.

Because with conventional speakers the only place to sit has been at the apex of the critical sound paths. And two inches to the left won't do.

But now there are Carlsson speakers.

They function quite differently. They're omni-directional. The very first that really work. The sound comes out of the top.

They were created by Stig Carlsson, formerly Professor of Acoustics at the Royal Institute of Technology in Stockholm. After years of research into sound reproduction.

What are Carlsson speakers really like? They fill a whole room with stereo sound. Wherever you sit, however much you move around, you're surrounded with stereo sound. Immersed in it. No other speaker anywhere in the world will give you that.

Carlsson speakers were introduced into Australia barely a couple of months ago. Write or phone us and we'll send you the Sonab literature and the name of your nearest dealer.

FALSIES: Trot along to your local Post Office and get some National Service registration forms - fill them in with the name of any friendly innocent citizen, being careful to avoid filling in forms for draft-resisters, and bring them to the DRU in the ANUSRC office in the Union. And if you personally are thinking of dodging the draft or registering as a Conscientious Objector, Phone 492444 and ask to speak to Claude Baxter, or a DRU member, for some friendly counselling.

THURSDAY JULY 27TH

CHANGE IN HEAD OF GOVT.

CANBERRA: 20th JULY (O.O.P.S)

Assertions circulating freely in governmental circles that there may be some change in the head of the Australian Government in the near future, were substantiated today when the News and Information Bureau released up to date snapshots of Mr. McMoan, a spokesman for the American Embassy told a Press conference in the Balcony Room at the Canberra Rex.

"There was every indication that the photographs were being distributed to tourists by door-men at Parliament House," Mr. Rice snapped and cracked over his glass of bubbly. Efforts to obtain prints by reporters were severely hampered by a strong contingent of Police picnicing on the lawns opposite the House. To add to the confusion, the debris brought by their organised games attracted a large number of fringe dwellers.

However, the head back doorman, Mr. I. Onstop, told the Piss Weekly that supplies were exhausted. He kindly consented to make available his own collection. All photographs but one were too fuzzy for reproduction.

operation itself is not difficult; after all most members of the government have been involved in graft at some stage", he said.

The Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Whipthem, said later today that the "whole thing" was an election stunt and that it was delicately and insidiously engineered to avoid reflection on the head of Government.

The prints were examined in detail before this story went to press by prominent Canberra medical practitioner, Dr. J. Ekyll. The feasibility of a transplant is not out of the question, he said. The

His last attempt was foiled when he was interrupted by a squad of troopers who had come to collect their pay. He almost had the strong room open.

It is believed that Dinnick stole the whole building to prevent a similar interruption this time.

Dinnick, who can neither read nor write has never heard of Sta-Dul soap or any other kind of soap. Police believe this is why he stole the building, not realising that it was no longer a bank.

Mr. Dinnick attributes his longevity to sin and gin interspersed with hard labour.

wrong," said Mr Dullard. Mr Dullard immediately informed the police and an immediate search was initiated.

A police spokesman admitted that the authorities were not so much worried by the magnitude of the crime as by the fact that the Annual Policeman's Fancy Dress Ball and Charade was to be held in the building this Saturday.

The police are confident that the work was that of one Joseph Dinnick, better known as Captain Daylight. Dinnick who was released from Long Bay Gaol last Saturday, had just finished a term of 99 years for a daring hold up of the Consolidated Colonial Bank in 1873.

SYDNEY, Thurs: Metropolitan Police, traffic police, mobile police, and women police were called out today to capture a man who stole the Consolidated Bank Building.

The theft was first discovered by Fred Dullard, a nightwatch man in the employ of Sta-Dul Soaps, the present owners of the building. Mr. Dullard reported that he had woken up at 1.25 am, as was his habit, and was about to commence his round of the time clocks when he noticed that the moon appeared to be extra bright.

"When I got to the first clock and found it wasn't there I realised that something was
